CHINESE WRITING

R—If adequate standards were available, the task would be more difficult than remembering to write. The same fundamental principles are involved in the control of the habits of the writer in the brush strokes which form the character. It is essentially the same as the control of the strokes of a pen. We have a fundamental knowledge of the characters and their use and the writing technique employed. We experienced our difficulties in learning adequate standards of comparison were available.

Answer—Exhaustive research has not enabled science to specify definitely that a man with a certain shaped head will be a criminal. Many extravagant claims have been made relative to phrenology, but such claims have not been based on scientific fact. On the other hand, many fine, upright, and honest individuals have heads which deviate very much from the normal.

what the word implies—a photograph so small that it requires a microscope to distinguish it; for example, a picture no larger than a pin-head of the signing of the "Declaration of Independence." An enlarged photograph is made by enlarging the size of the normal-sized portrait or view. A portrait of President Roosevelt's face three feet long would be an enlargement. The photo-micrograph is a greatly magnified photograph of a very small object as seen through a microscope. In photo-micros, on the small scratches of a bullet, invisible to the naked eye, appear as definite grooves.

QUESTION—Is the lie detector of any use in crime detection?—E. A. R. Oklahoma.

ANSWER—Is in the hands of one properly qualified to operate it; the lie detector is an invaluable aid to modern crime detection. However, it has its limitations and should be operated only by those who have special training and who are capable of making the proper interpretations of the recordings. I have found its use to be of immeasurable value in many of my cases in exonerating innocent persons from suspicion as well as determining those who have guilty knowledge.

Q. Now, in your experience, have you ever known of a case in which there were no other persons involved? A. Yes, Manila, I

ANSWER: I have personally made tests which show that these stains can be positively identified as being: 1. murdered; 2. the stains which I examined were on an old army uniform and 3. an old murder case. The stains I examined were found in my own home about twenty years ago and I have since then sent these specimens to several of the best and trusted experts in the country for their examination and their report stated that the stains were not the result of blood, the stains were indistinguishable from a blood stain from man or from any other animal.

new who attacked him but he carried his secret with him to the grave. J. C. was Inspector Guzman's man!

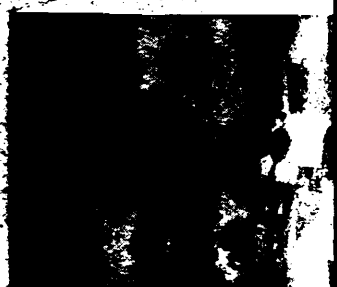

To the apartment house in Kalamazoo Street Inspector Gusman repaired again. At every flat he knocked and entered. To each occupant he asked one question: "Do you know anyone whose initials were J. J.?" Some shook their heads, some stared at the detective, some said nothing. Then finally he came to the third floor where he finished him. The clue he had found there was a certain Julius Gans, who owned the apartment two doors from the murdered man's flat.

"Duke" Elauria? Was the whole revolting deed a desperate scheme of hers to rid her of the man who had been inhumanly cruel to her, who took her kisses and gave her lashes? Was the attack on her person part of the macabre plot? But Inspector Gusman could not bring himself to link the unhappy woman with the murder. The battering of her head was too brutal to be part of a pre-arranged, rehearsed plan. But, if she did not engineer the murder, did she not precipitate it? This, Inspector Gusman decided to find out.

FROM Isabel Matias he learned the story of Felicidad Tayag, a typical Manila (or any big city, for that matter) story. It was the story of a girl who craved gorgeous clothes and jewelry. Lured by satyrs, she followed the foot steps of Manila's loose women whose clinging clothes hid sin-wrecked bodies. Then she grew tired of the life that gave her trinkets and alluring gowns but made her a pariah. She wanted to be free from the perennial dread of a policeman's uniform. Thus when a man offered her a home, she gladly consented to live with him. It was at this time that Elauria, the son of Manila's gangland, entered her life. Attracted to him, she gave up the chance of a better life. She missed the thrill, danger and love promised her by the debonair vice baron. But who was the man from whom Elauria snatched Felicidad? Inspector Gusman snapped at the girl's mother. Surely this was a lead!

"Andres Donato," was the ready answer. The hopes of Inspector Gusman were again dashed to the ground. Andres Donato! And the initials on the handkerchief were J. C. Still, could it be possible that Donato, blinded by an insane desire to get even with the man who stole his woman, hatched the whole infernal plot to the minutest details, even to the extent of using the handkerchief of someone else entirely to mislead the authorities? At any rate, the detective decided to run down this perplexing angle of the case.

Accompanied by Isabel Matias, Inspector Gusman swooped down upon the house of Andres Donato in Galas, which is located in the suburbs of Manila. The detective found his quarry, who, much to his surprise, submitted to him peacefully. He lost no time in taking him to headquarters for questioning.

Inspector Gusman was due for another appointment that day. Andres Donato, after a severe grilling, not only denied knowledge of the crime but furnished interrogator with an air-tight alibi. Asked of his whereabouts on the night the life of Eugenio Elauria was snuffed out, he simply answered: "I was sleeping." Andres Donato, however, could easily simulate sleep, slip out of his home un-apartment was never visited. Elauria knew who attacked him but he carried his secret with him to the grave. J. C. was Inspector Gusman's man!

To the apartment house in Kalibabas, Street Inspector Gusman repaired again. At every flat he knocked and entered. To each occupant he asked one question: did they know anyone whose initials were J. C.? Some shook their heads, some stared at the detective, some of them indignantly. Then finally, he was met by the slain gangster's neighbor. There nished him the clue he had been waiting for. It was a certain Julian Canlas who occupied the apartment two doors from the murdered man's flat.

THE hunt was getting hotter! The detective resumed his tedious task. From the occupants of the other flats he asked another question: who was this Julian ACCOMPANIED by Detective Canlas returned to the place of the murder on September 20th. A birth sensation that the woman knew more than she dared to divulge. At that very moment Julian Canlas might be hiding in his house.

Upon arriving at the place, Inspector Gusman came out of the man's flat. His hat was pulled well over his eyes. Without paying any attention to the stranger, they entered. They were met by the woman who had not given them time to talk.

"That is your man," she said, shaking a finger at the detective. They had met at the door of the house of Rufino de los Angeles, Oroquieta Street, which blocks away from the scene of the murder. Canlas found Santos conversing with friend, Arsenio Bamba, in the street. The detectives saw him join in their conversation.

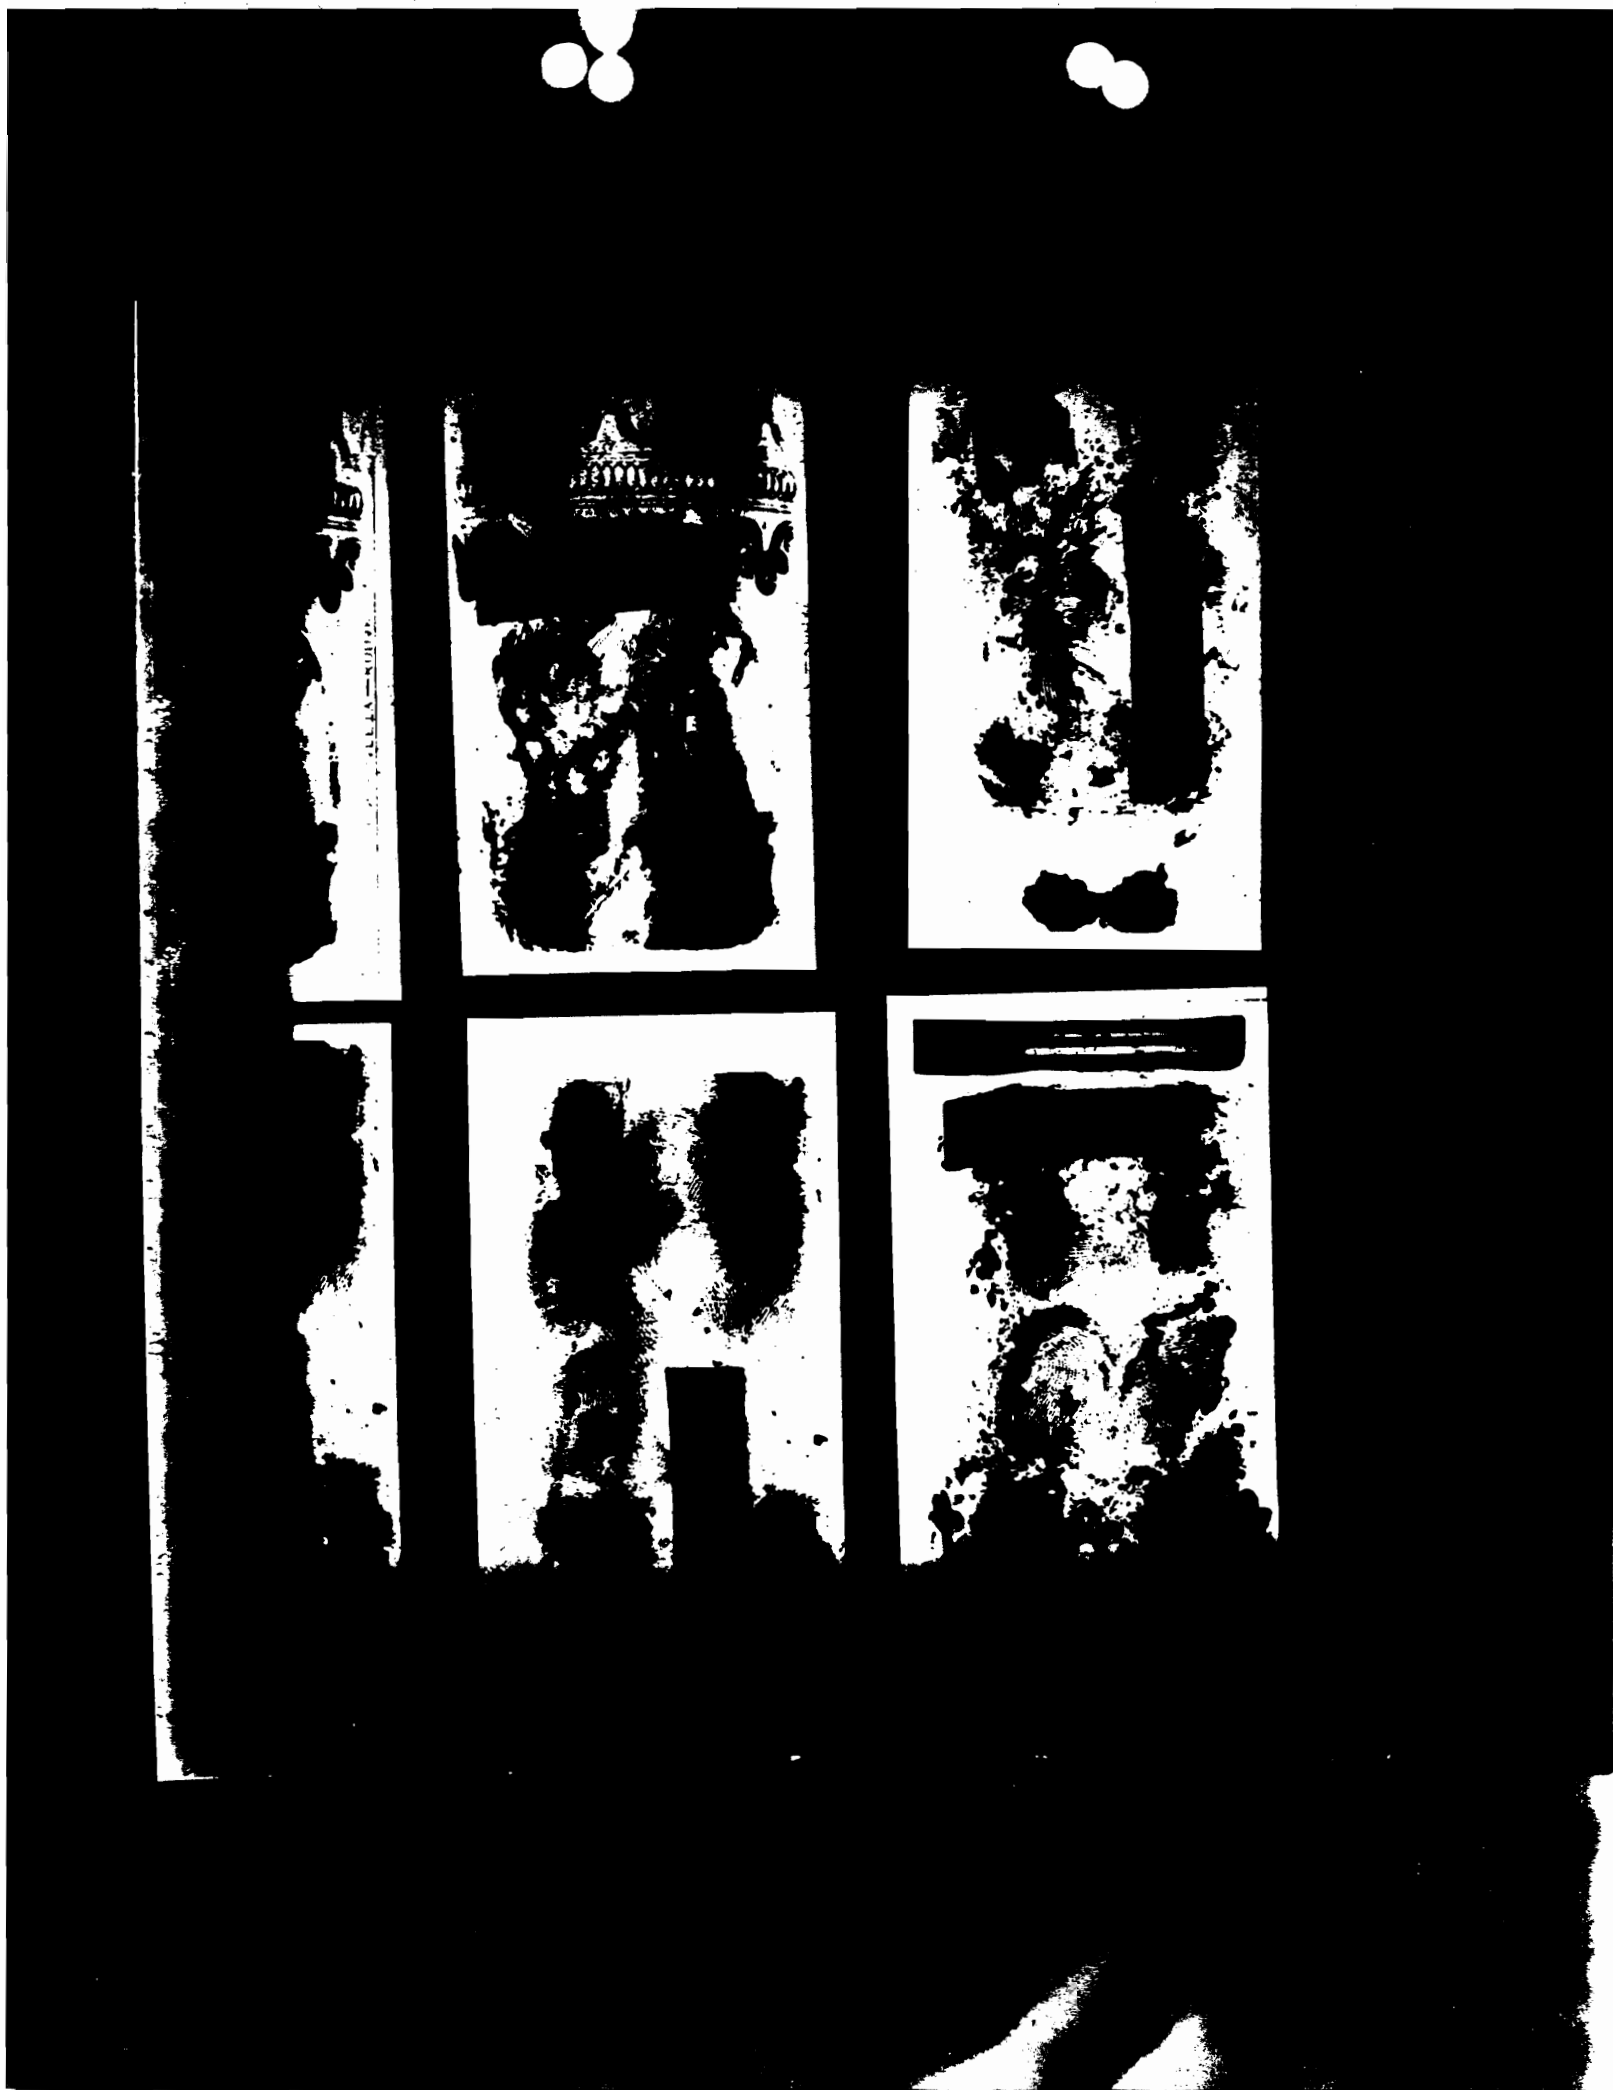

Inspector Gusman decided to wait long enough. At 12:30 he entered the front yard of the house and surprised Julian Canlas. He took him up to headquarters along with friend Bamba for grilling.
